Valuation doesn't seem to matter

PER multiples of defensive stocks now at large premium to the week pre Lehman Shock

When looking at the Topix sectors in the recent sell off, it is evident the relative valuations among the 'defensive' sectors are trading at significant premiums to that of pre-Lehman collapse. While passive ETFs/low variance portfolios seem behind much of these moves, it is none-the-less little comfort for those seeking a safe haven in defensive sectors. Valuation as a metric hasn't seemed to have mattered.

Food Sector

Sapporo the only food stock up on Aug 24 and is at a discount to pre Lehman levels

The Food sector also shows some relatively expensive valuations but we note that Sapporo Holdings was one of only five stocks (above ¥50bn market cap) that closed August 24 in positive territory.

Itoen (2593) and Kikkoman Corp (2801) are down 14% in the 5 days since August 17th. Sapporo Holdings (2501) is down only 2% over that same period.

Stocks trading at 100% premiums or more vs 1W pre Lehman

As there seems to be little valuation dynamics in the market we list the relative premiums of stocks one week ago versus the week preceding Lehman Shock.

Of course, within this study, the question of normalised earnings will have played an impact in creating some distortions. Hosiden (6804) is the perfect example of that with net income of ¥13.9bn in FY3/2009 versus a Bloomberg estimate in FY3/2016E of c. ¥100mn.

Eisai (4523) had net income of ¥47.7bn (FY3/2009) versus a Bloomberg estimate in FY3/2016E of c. ¥22.4bn. Since Jan 2015, Eisai shares have rallied over 90% to August 17th.

Conclusion

While not an exact science we can see that valuations do not seem to have been a factor in the market rally to date in 2015. ETF driven factors seem to be evident with the large gap in relative valuations versus the pre Lehman period. Also the sharp sell-off this week would suggest that we are likely seeing ETF positions being liquidated. Minimum variance portfolios will likely have impacted too. The expensive valuations (relative) in defensive stocks will only compound the ability to weather the market sell down.
